By the time he carried the GB flag at the Opening Ceremony of his fifth Olympic Games in Beijing (2008), Mark was already one of the country's most celebrated athletes. Now, still one of Britain's best recognised Olympians, Mark remains a figurehead for British Swimming, as well as a champion and vocal advocate on discussions around LGBT+ diversity and inclusion.

After a career which saw Mark win 51 international medals and set 8 world records, Mark moved seamlessly into the studio for the Delhi Commonwealth Games. Having been recognised in 2012 alongside Clare Balding for their coverage of the London Olympics, Mark has been a mainstay on the BBC where his insight, clarity of thought and natural chemistry in front of camera is held in high regard.

Away from the pool, Mark's dalliance with wearing very little continued with an acclaimed appearance in The Real Full Monty in 2012, having temporarily covered up to much fanfare during his stint on Strictly Come Dancing. Since then he's become a global ambassador for his signature range with Ted Baker, created a swimming line with Zone3 and founded a grassroots swimming academy putting on clinics throughout the country.

Having internalised and avoided the question of his sexuality throughout his career, Mark decided in 2017 to share his story in part to be true to himself and those who are going through a similar struggle, but also as a point of challenge to the casual levels of homophobia or prejudice he felt was prevalent in society. Mark has made this part of his life and the impact it had on his swimming career a focal part of his corporate offering.
